

The Problem

Young adult friend groups have trouble organising meetups, typically due to poor communication.

From our interviews and our survey of 46 people, we found out that it is often the case people usually wait to see who else responds before they decide, leading to friction in the group chat.

How might we reduce hesitancy in young adults when setting up plans to meet with their friends, and surface the small tweaks that would win over people who'd otherwise drop out, so 'maybe' plans become confirmed meetups?

Our Initial Ideas

A mobile app that:

- Allows anyone to suggest a meetup, with a date, time and place, along with a deadline for the rest of the group to respond.
- Other group members can say “yes I’ll make it”, “no I won’t make it”, or “I will make it if...”.
- “I will make it if...” allows the group member to propose a different time, privately specify they’ll only go if their friends are going, or write their own custom conditions.
- All results are hidden until the deadline.
- At the deadline, everyone can view who’s going.

Meetup Suggestion Screen

“Is it clear what everything there is for?”

“The map doesn’t really show me if it’s gonna be a route, a location...”

“What do you think would be suitable for that map? If you were to suggest a meetup what would a map be for?”

“I guess it would be the start point, and then the description could say it’s a walk.”
