

Friends keep making plans.
They keep not making them too.

Friendship, in early adulthood, is work.

Suggesting.

Coordinating schedules.

Chasing replies.

1 in 3

young adults feel lonely at least once a week.

75%

say they have many friends.

- Loves to cook for his friends
- Extroverted and reliable

The suggester.

One plan. From the suggestion, to the empty seat.

Vasanth's Christmas break, mapped as he felt it.

He would keep organising without complaint, if the effort felt shared.

He is starting to suspect he is the only one who cares about the meetups.

To learn more about the problems regarding meetups,
we talked to young adults.

“If I drummed up the plan, and it's taken considerable time, looking at logistics, pricing, whether everyone's okay with it, and then it falls through after all of that, that's quite frustrating.”

Luca, 21, the organiser 3rd year Psychology at Goldsmiths

“As days went past, [the meetup] got more drawn out, second thoughts crept in, and more and more people ended up pulling out.”

Marketing Apprentice

“If [I’m meeting] a friend of a friend, my attendance is conditional on my friend being there. I’ll wait for them to respond first, then decide.”

Two key takeaways.

1. SUGGESTORS

One sided and exhausting. Awkward to push for replies.

2. PASSIVE PARTICIPANTS

Uncertainty compounds uncertainty.
Some people's participation is contingent on others.

There are tools for RSVPing and scheduling.
They all rely on assumed certainty.

POLLS TO FIND A TIME

Everyone ticks when they're free.
But available is not the same as coming.

No one.

THE OPEN GAP

A way to lift the load off the initiator, and let people commit on each other rather than into silence.

How might we help young adult friend groups organise with equal effort, foster certainty in followers, and make meetups happen?
